The value of its training for close observation, clear thinking, and precise expression is widely admitted, as is also the applicability of much of its subject-matter to practical affairs. But I sometimes think that those who stand as its advocates, and perhaps its teachers also, do not sufficiently emphasize the dignity and worth which pertain to it as a serious study of nature, of nature in the broadest significance of the term; for surely that which elevates and ennobles should be found, if it be sought, in the wonders of material creation, the handiwork of infinite intelligence, as truly as in the history of men s achievements in material things. I am not so sure that the laboratory method for chemistry has received as general assent as has the claim in behalf of the science for a place in the curriculum. For my part, I almost think that...
